An astronomer lived in a certain town.

The astronomer had a small observatory and a large, beautiful telescope.

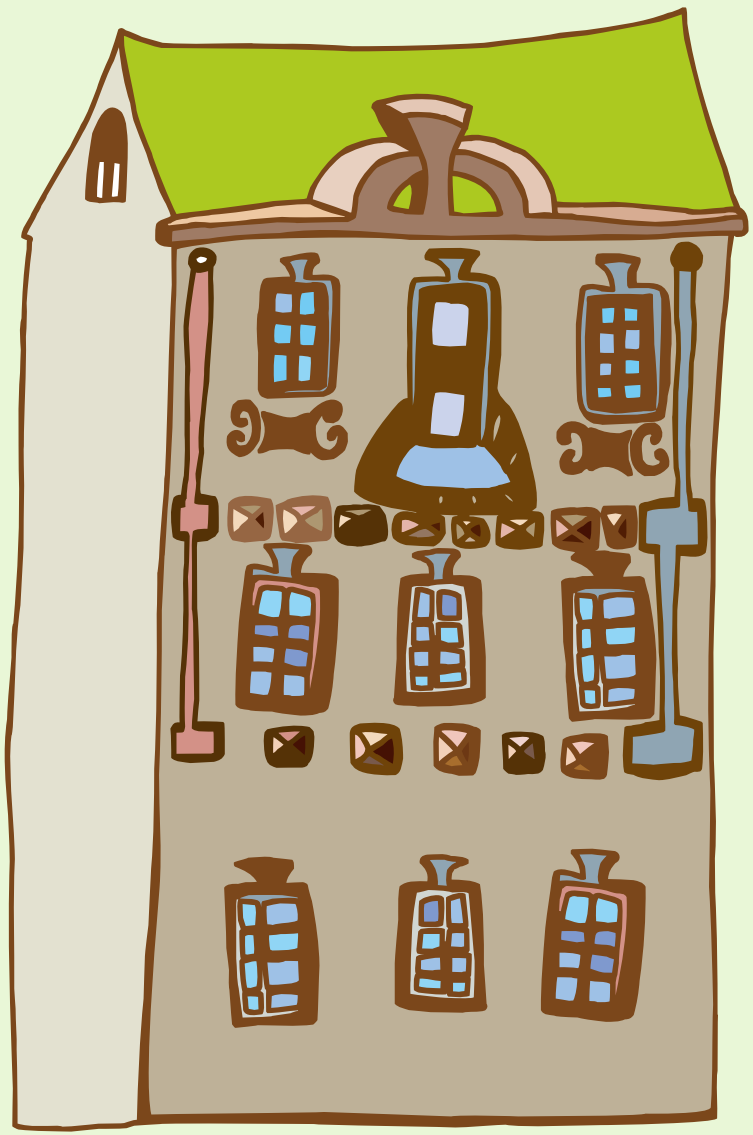

Every night, the telescope observed the starry sky.

The telescope knew almost everything about galaxies, stars and planets.

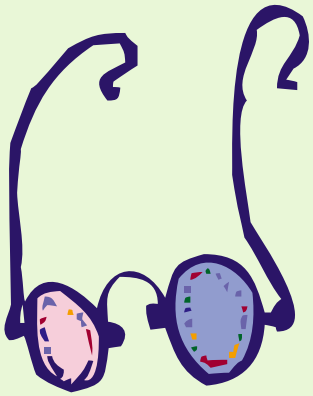

And because of the fact that he only looked at the night's sky,

he knew nothing about cities, parks and people.

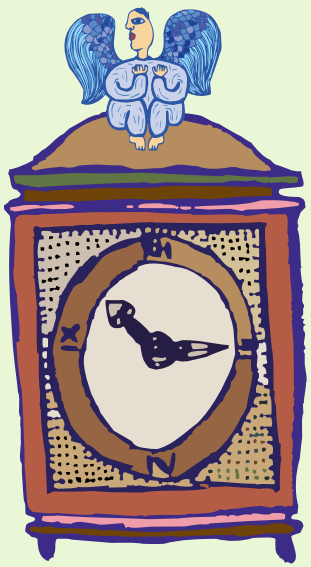

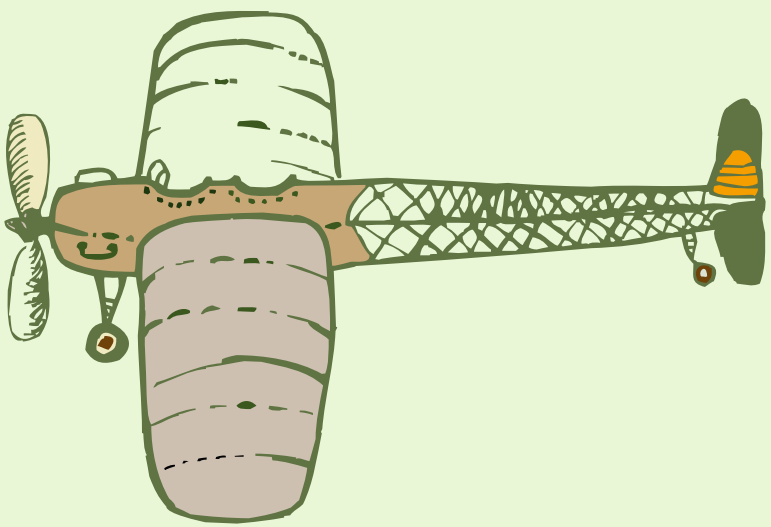

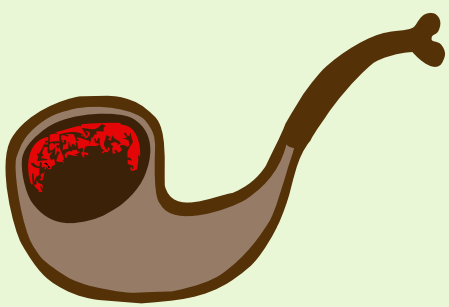

One night, the telescope got so engaged in observing the sky that he didn't even notice the daybreak.

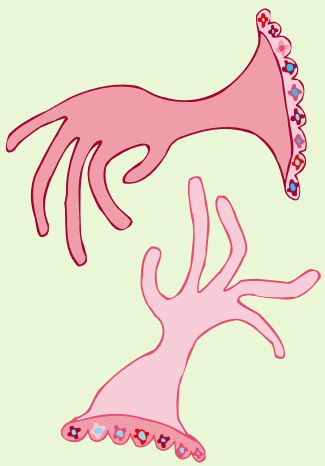

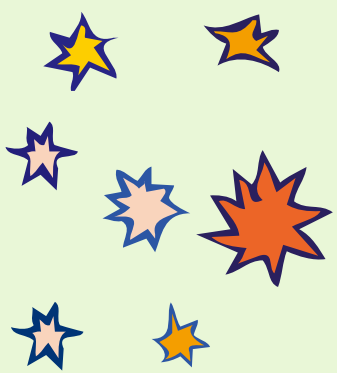

And when the dawn broke and the stars disappeared from the sky the Astronomer turned his telescope and looked at the town around him.

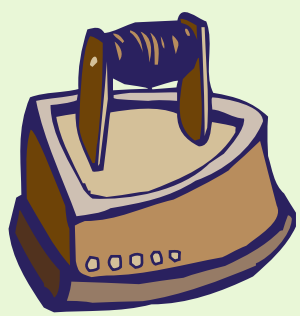

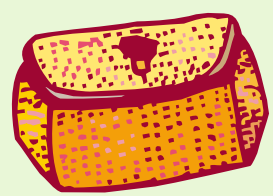

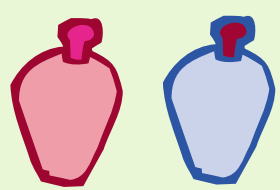

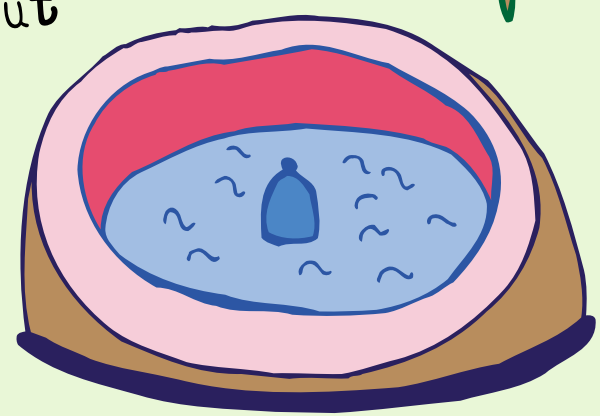

The telescope was astonished by the beauty of the world. Even though he considered himself to be quite intelligent, he knew nothing about the city that he lived in.

Ever since that day, the telescope couldn't wait for dawn to break

and then he observed

the city, the parks and various objects with great curiosity.

The telescope was no longer interested in the stars, the galaxies and the planets.

Therefore, the astronomer had to buy a new telescope. And he took the old one to the museum.
